

Bringing you news, advice, and tools to improve your barn management experience

The Official Barn Management Software of US Equestrian

No matter your age, August typically means one thing: it's back-to-school time. For high schoolers, the start of the academic year means you are inching closer to college, so now might be the time to start formulating a plan, especially if you want your future to involve riding at the collegiate level.

Here are some things you can do to proactively set yourself up to ride competitively in college, thanks to Ruth Sorrel of Sorrel Equestrian Consulting:

1. Do your research.

It's important to both college coaches and admissions officers that prospective students are passionate about attending their particular school. Be sure to adequately research the equestrian teams offered at each school and also look at the academic programs to make sure each college you're looking into would be an all-around fit for you. Make a checklist of items you're looking for in a school, such as proximity to home, an NCEA or IHSA team, and particular areas of study, then start to form your list of schools that fit this checklist.

TIP OF THE MONTH

Baby food is a great solution for all those terrible-tasting medications! Mix carrot or apple-flavored baby food with medicine before administering it to your horse. Just be sure to avoid broccoli and other veggies that may be harmful to horses.
